Information Has Value

The Chronicle of Higher Ed recently featured information literacy in its 2017 Trends Report. Helping students separate fact from fiction is seen as one of the ten key shifts in higher ed this year. So we're right in step with this trend as we focus on frame three of the Information Literacy Framework for Higher Education: Information Has Value. This frame addresses the various ways information has value: as a product that is bought and sold, as a means to influence, and as a means of negotiating and understanding the world.

The questions librarians have posed to help students understand this frame are:

- ⇒ What is the purpose of this information?
- ⇒ Who has access to this information and who does not? Why?
- ⇒ When and how can this information be reused? What are the restrictions on reuse?
- ⇒ How does the value of your online personal information and history of interactions affect the information you receive online?

As a recap from previous newsletters, the six information literacy "frames" from the Association of College & Research Libraries guide us in developing a deep understanding of how information is created, shared, and valued within specific contexts:

- Authority Is Constructed and Contextual
- Information Creation as a Process
- Information Has Value
- Research as Inquiry
- Scholarship as Conversation
- Searching as Strategic Exploration

Data, Data & More Data

The Library has a number of products that offer data, statistics and infographics. Here are some highlights:

- ◇ Simmons OneView is new to UWW. It brings a brand's target consumers to life with vivid and complete profiles, including demographics, lifestyles, attitudes, brand preferences, and media use. All data is drawn from the National Consumer Study (NCS) and National Hispanic Consumer Study (NHCS) surveys of U.S. adults, 18 and over.
- ◇ Statista offers 1 million stats from government and proprietary sources on just about any topic. It's global in scope and includes splashy infographics that can be cited and freely used in publications and course materials.
